WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

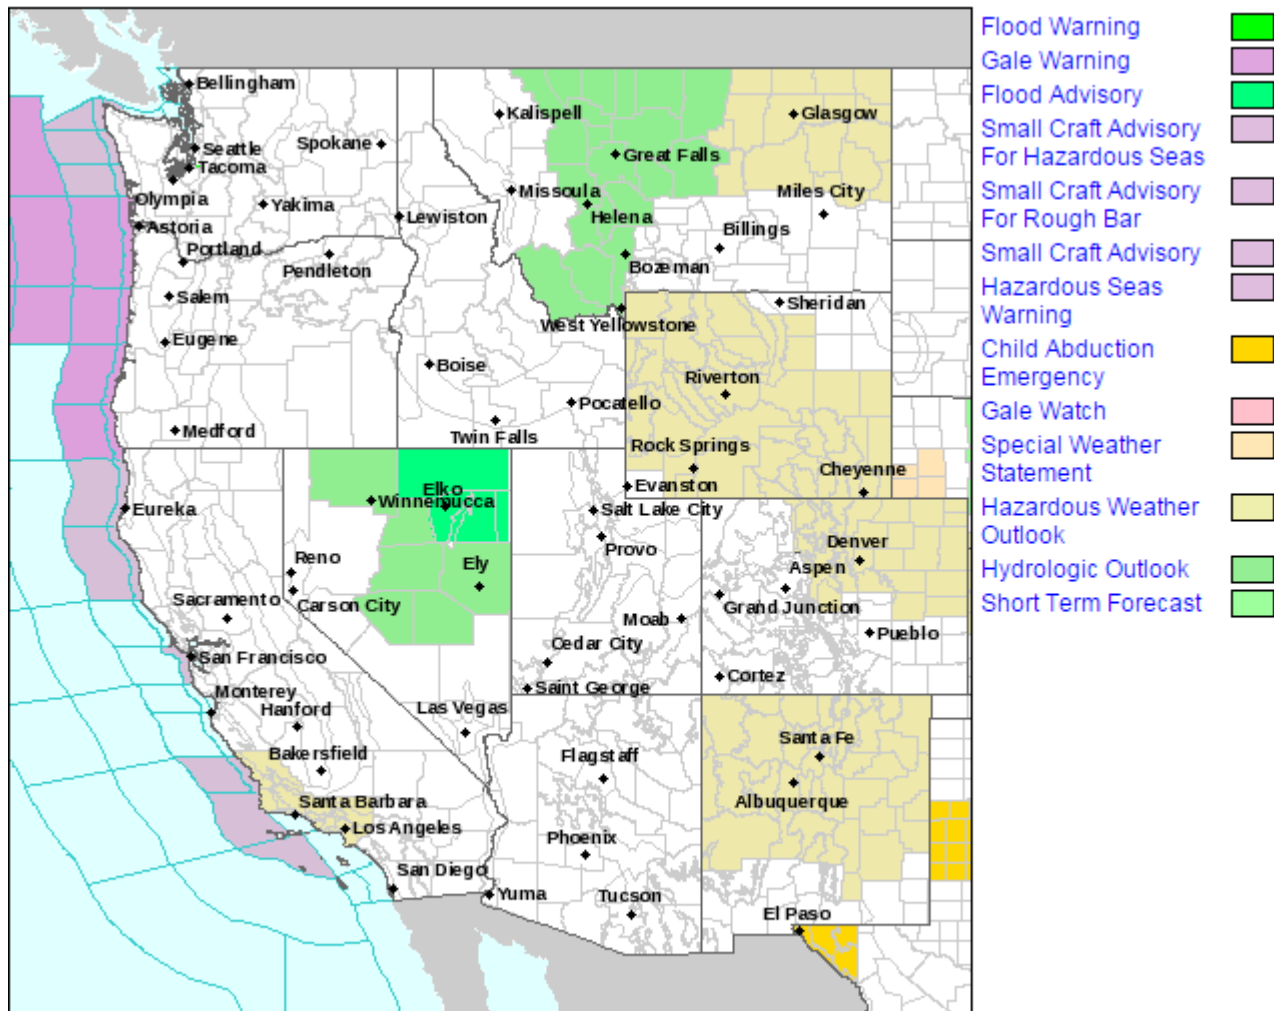

Dry weather with a warming trend will impact Northern California into early next week as high pressure over the west coast strengthens through Tuesday. On Sunday, daytime highs will be about 2-3 degrees warmer than today with a more significant warm up Monday & Tuesday. The ridge develops a higher amplitude with the axis centered over Northern California on Monday and Tuesday. Expect valley highs to peak in the low 70s with 50s and 60s in higher terrain. That places Monday and Tuesday highs about 8-12 degrees above average for this time of year. Winds will generally be light in the short term and the main concern between now and Tuesday will be the development of patchy morning valley fog. Motorists should be cautious during morning commutes as visibilities may change suddenly along the road. Main areas of concern for patchy fog include the Modesto-Stockton area up into the Sacramento Metro region and northward into Marysville and towards Chico. Some fog may also impact the Delta region.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Generally weak onshore flow prevailed for the coast and adjacent valleys with weak offshore flow noted in the foothills and mountains. Temps this afternoon were a few degrees above normal with the warmest valleys reaching the mid 70s. The weak mainly flat upper level ridge will slowly build over Southern California tonight through Monday night with the ridge axis moving over Southern California on Tuesday. Patchy dense fog will be possible again early sun morning in the Salinas River Valley with some clouds moving in from the southern San Joaquin valley into southern San Luis Obispo County late tonight into sun morning. Mostly clear skies will prevail through Tuesday. Local gusty northerly winds will be possible Sunday morning along the I-5 corridor and over portions of the Santa Barbara mountains and South Coast. The winds will turn more northeast with gusty winds expected in the favored areas of Ventura and Los Angeles Counties and over higher terrain of San Luis Obispo and Santa Barbara Counties later Sunday night into Monday morning. Winds should remain below advisory levels as support for widespread strong winds is minimal. This weather pattern will bring a warming trend to the area through Tuesday. Temperatures will warm to significantly above normal levels by Monday with near record highs possible in some areas Monday and Tuesday. Highs are forecast to reach the low 90s in the warmest valleys both days.
